Philosophy / Philosophy of Medicine

Doctorandus Degree (M.A.), with Honorable Mention

June 16, 1987, Catholic University of Nijmegen (presently named: Radboud University Nijmegen), The Netherlands

Post-graduate certificate in Philosophy of Medicine

February 5, 1990, Catholic University of Nijmegen (presently named: Radboud University Nijmegen), The Netherlands

* Literally, the word Doctorandus means “he who has to become a doctor.” Unlike the Ph.D.-cand. degree, the Drs. degree is a terminal degree. It is therefore most equivalent to a Master’s degree. Upon completion of the theoretical component of their studies, medical students are awarded a Drs. degree, i.e., a Master’s of Medical Sciences degree. Upon completion of two additional years of rotations, the license to practice medicine is granted. They do not receive an M.D. degree. The Doctorate (Ph.D. in medicine) is granted only to M.Med.S.-graduates who also complete a doctoral dissertation.

 In The Netherlands, academicians seeking their doctorate degree are not considered students. Rather, they are usually employed and salaried by the university to undertake the research and write the dissertation. Some academicians are specifically employed to undertake their doctoral research project (typically four years); others (like myself) are expected to undertake doctoral research as part of their academic function in a specified period. The doctorate is granted on the basis of the dissertation (research, writing and public defense). My doctorate in medicine was granted by the School of Biomedical Sciences of the Catholic University of Nijmegen on the basis of a medical-ethical dissertation.

Law

Doctorandus Degree (J.D.), *Cum Laude

Aug. 17, 1990, University of Limburg (presently named: University of Maastricht), The Netherlands

* All graduate studies in The Netherlands end with a “Doctorandus” degree. This is true of medicine, philosophy as well as law. Since completion of law studies in the U.S. rarely leads to a Master’s degree (LLM), but usually to a J.D. degree, the Dutch Drs. degree in law is most equivalent to the J.D. degree.
